lives; had been brought up very differently.

Jimmy had liked the free and easy benemianism of the set in which Cynthia moved; he was not so sure about Christine's.

He was utterly wretched as he walked home. He had tied himself for life; there would be no slipping out of this engagement. Poor little Christine! She deserved a better man. He felt acutely conscious of his own unworthiness. He walked the whole way home. He was dog-tired when he let himself into his rooms. Sangster rose from a chair by the fire.

Jimmy stifled an oath under his breath as he shut the door.

Sangster was the last man he wished to see at the present moment. He kept his eyes averted as he came forward. "Helio!" he said. "Been here long?" "All the evening. Thought you'd sure be in. Costin said you'd be in to dinner, he thought."

"I meant to stayed with the Wyatts, though."

Jimmy helped himself to a whisky. It knew that Sangster was watching him. His gaze became unbearable. He swung around with sharp impatience. "What are you staring at?" he demanded, irritably. "Nothing Wher a surly butte you're

He swung around with sharp impatience. "What are you staring at?" he demanded, irritably.

"Nothing. What a surly brute you're getting. Got a cigarette?"

Jimmy threw his case over.

"By the way," he said, with overdone carelessness, "I've got some news for you. It'll be in all the papers tomorrow, so I thought I might as well tell ou first." There was a little pause.

"Well?" said Sangster, shortly.

Jimmy struck a match on the sole of his shoe.

"I'm engaged," he said, "to Christine."
